JORDAN TATE: MAKING MY TRAUMA A STRENGTH FOR MY ENDEAVORS

“Making my trauma a strength for my endeavors”

Rebellious and gentle at the same time, assertive yet mysterious, often elusive, passionate and dedicated to her writing to which she devotes entire days, to the point of cutting off her phone for days at a time to be alone with her story and her characters, Jordan Tate is a productive author.

The woman who credits the movie “King Kong” as the trigger and revelation of her passion for film and storytelling recently published “BLACK MASS”, the dark tale of a young woman’s macabre revenge through her encounter with an enigmatic musician, coupled with an anthology of horrific stories about the ghosts of French cemetery Pere Lachaise.

Victim of an assault a few years ago by a man who was (she emphasizes) not her boyfriend, Jordan ends her book by declaring that she draws inspiration from this assailant for her darkest scenes, especially the murder scenes.

“Seeing his face in the faces of my characters’ victims is a great outlet,” she says.

Especially since she also points out that the man in question is responsible for her father’s heart attack, whose heartbreaking loss in August 2019 left a deep psychic trauma in her.

In her note to all women victims of violence and harassment concluding “Black Mass,” Jordan encourages them to speak out and name their abuser, something she herself has done on her blog, websites and social networks and youtube channel. Making this trauma a strength for her upcoming struggles and endeavors.

Jordan is currently finishing her new novel “White Gold”, which will be published in French and English in a few weeks, putting her love of animals to good use in a story about ivory trafficking, a novel she describes as a story of adventure, love and once again revenge, a subject that seems to be one of the favorite themes of her upcoming literary journeys.
